

GPO'S FDsys Named One of the Best Government Web Sites

Government Computer News (GCN), in its July 27, 2009 issue, named GPO's Federal Digital System (FDsys) one of the "10 Great Government Web Sites". GCN rated the sites on how well they have incorporated interactive tools that serve the public and how well they support President Obama's goal to increase Government transparency.

GPO launched FDsys earlier this year. This system gives the American people a one-stop site to authentic, published Government information. FDsys allows GPO to receive information from all three branches of the Federal Government and create a repository for permanent public access. FDsys offers sophisticated search capabilities for users such as: searching by Congressional Committee, a Member of Congress, keyword and date. FDsys will replace GPO Access in 2009 and releases with additional functionality will occur throughout the next several years.

Among the other 9 Web sites included on the list is Science.gov. As a member of CENDI and the Science.gov Alliance, GPO helps support and coordinate this Web site.

For more information about the 10 Great Government Web Sites, follow these links:

- * Full story
- * FDsys portion of the story
- * FDsys
- * GPO press release